In-Progress

“Mixed Blessing: Trans-Appalachian Settlement and the Society of Friends in the Years After the American Revolution.” The book examines the migration of members of the Society of Friends from the east coasts of PA and NC to western Pennsylvania and the Ohio Valley. The study makes clear that religion played an essential role in the creation of community and cultural identity in trans-Appalachian settlement for members of the Society of Friends. Westward resettlement enhanced the loyalties of long-standing members, especially during the initial waves of migration. Aid of earlier settled Friends provided assistance to newly arrived members, and that support made affiliation more appealing to many settling in the west and strengthened in-group cohesion. Even so, frontier conditions presented strong challenges to the cohesiveness and theological integrity of Friends. For members of the Society of Friends, western migration during the last decades of the eighteenth century was a mixed blessing.

“Apple Orchards and All: The Reinterpretation of Blowing Rock North Carolina’s Flat Top Estate” article in progress for submission to the Appalachian Journal. Focuses on the Cone estate and its workers. It also highlights the important role of Bertha Cone in the success of the estate. Revises earlier interpretation of Bertha Cone and her role in the management of the estate.

“Transparent Interpretation: Telling it Like it Was.” Article in progress for submission to the Journal of Public History. The article discusses a model for interpreting historic sites I call “transparent interpretation,” which I define as when choices are made to problematize aspects of an exhibit, reveal the evolution of site interpretation, or show visitors behind the views of a site.

“She Writes Like a Man”: Barbara Tuchman and the Historical Profession,” chapter in progress for a larger book-length project called “She Thinks Like a Man: Women Historians and the Historical Profession.” A collective biography of women historians from the 18th to 21st centuries.

“Greater Expectations.” This book project is being co-authored with Dr. Martha McCaughey, Professor of Sociology. The book explores the social and historical context of the shifting life/work balances of mothers, relaxed gender roles, and the increasing attention to child welfare and development. The book offers an intimate portrait of why women find their work and family realities so different than how they envisioned them.
